

The Other Side

Every completed trade has two willing parties. If you cannot say who is selling what you are buying — and why they are willing — you do not have an edge. You have a narrative with a blank across the table.

WHAT EDGE IS

Edge is a claim that you hold information, or a capacity to act on information, that is not yet in the book at your size. It must be falsifiable. ‘The stock is cheap’ is not edge. ‘This holder must sell by Friday because of X, and the book at this size cannot absorb it without moving Y’ is a claim.

QUESTIONS THAT BELONG ON LINE 3

- Is the other side a forced seller, a hedger, an indexer, an agent, or a principal with a different horizon?
- Do they know what you think you know? If yes, why are they still willing?
- Is your capacity (capital, access, speed, mandate) the actual difference — not your opinion?
- What would make them more willing tomorrow, which would erase the claim?

KEN CORDELE GRIFFIN ACADEMY

EDGE AS A CLAIM

The Other Side

FORBIDDEN SUBSTITUTIONS

- Do not replace the other side with a television personality.
- Do not replace the other side with 'the market.' The market is the arrangement. It does not sit across from you.
- Do not treat a backtest as a person. A curve has no mandate and no constraint.
- Do not treat your own earlier self as the other side unless you are closing your own position.